SATURDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1847.

A Railroad to the Pacific.

This vast project seems to be gaining ground. The public mind is becoming more and more imbued with the idea of a great transcontinental line, and the plans and views to different parts of the country are becoming more and more united. The great interest in the subject is now so general, that it is not only the people, but the government, that are becoming more and more imbued with the idea of a great transcontinental line, and the plans and views to different parts of the country are becoming more and more united. The great interest in the subject is now so general, that it is not only the people, but the government, that are becoming more and more imbued with the idea of a great transcontinental line, and the plans and views to different parts of the country are becoming more and more united.

The first consideration on this subject is the feasibility of the project. It is a question of the practicability of the project, and the first consideration on this subject is the feasibility of the project. It is a question of the practicability of the project, and the first consideration on this subject is the feasibility of the project. It is a question of the practicability of the project, and the first consideration on this subject is the feasibility of the project.
